PREFATORY NOTE.

This List has been compiled by Mr. H. W. Prior, of the Department of Engraving, Illustration and Design, Mr. Edward F. Strange, Keeper of the Department of Woodwork, has contributed a Preface.

Acknowledgment must here be made of the gift by the Society of Antiquaries of London, of a large collection of rubbings, which resulted in the addition of 1527 examples to the permanent Museum collections, besides supplying others for the use of the Circulation Department. The extent of this gift has made the publication of this catalogue not only desirable but a necessity.

INTRODUCTION

THE collection of rubbings of Monumental brasses in the Department of Engraving, Illustration and Design, of the Victoria and Albert Museum, now numbers more than 2,300 examples. Of these the majority are from brasses in, or made for British churches, and the present catalogue is intended to represent the art of the maker of monumental brasses as practised in this country. For the sake of convenience, however, the rubbings of foreign brasses and slabs have been included as an appendix. That the representation of British brasses is fairly good may be concluded from the consideration that the Museum collection appears to comprise rubbings from more than five eighths of all the brasses estimated to be still in existence, while among these are to be found examples of almost every one of any substantial importance.

The study of brasses has chiefly, hitherto, been an occupation for the archaeologist or genealogist, and the practical value to students of the arts and customs of our country has been rather lost sight of—though by no means ignored by careful writers such as Haines¹. In the first place, it is worth while to point out that these brasses, both from the fact that they were metal plates, engraved, and from the actual style and technique of the engraving, indicate a knowledge, in England, of the essentials of the art of engraving metal plate, at least as early as the 13th century, with, often, a cultured skill of draughtsmanship and mastery of line and shading, which, in their way, were by no means inferior to the productions of the later art of copper plate engraving—claiming a definite origin only from somewhere near the year 1446. The art of engraving connotes two processes—the preparation of a plate, and the multiplying of impressions therefrom. So far as the first step carries us, there is no doubt that the beauty and technical merit of the English brasses entitles our country to an early and honourable place in the history of engraving. It was an old practice to fill in the lines of a brass with black or coloured composition, and one might express surprise that this conjunction of materials did not develop the metal-plate printing-process, long before it came, by similar means, to the hands of German or Italian goldsmiths. That it did not so occur need be attributed simply to the size of the brasses and to the scarcity and costliness of paper. Nothing else retarded the so called "invention" of engraving, in Europe, for so many centuries after the enjoyment of cheap paper had made it familiar to China. For its own sake, the mere engraving of British monumental brasses, therefore, well deserves the attention of the student, and good rubbings supply perhaps the most convenient means by which such a study can be pursued.

Other points of view to which the attention of the student may be directed, arise from a consideration of the various subjects represented on the brasses. The chief of these is COSTUME, in one form or another. Thus, the Museum collection of rubbings supplies a series of illustrations of ARMS AND ARMOUR ranging, without any break of more than a few years, from 1277 to 1680, covering the history of this interesting and important handicraft from the first appearance of plate armour in conjunction with mail, to the final disuse of metal defences for the body of the soldier. CIVIL COSTUME, similarly, is exemplified in its main changes from the year 1310 to the end of the 17th century, and ECCLESIASTICAL VESTMENTS range from the same year to 1631. A number of examples of mediæval JUDICIAL AND ACADEMICAL personages, in the robes of their day, are also included, and the specimens of RELIGIOUS SYMBOLS, CHALICES AND HERALDRY are also worth a study. Each of these sections can be referred to in detail as regards its prevailing types, and the arrangement of the catalogue being in classes and chronological, it is easy to ascertain at once whether the collection includes rubbings, which can be regarded as absolutely authentic in respect of date, illustrating the subject under consideration at any particular epoch.

A good account of the technique of the brasses is supplied by Haines's work already referred to (Vol I, Introduction). The author therein indulges in some interesting and enlightening speculations as to the derivation of the art from the earlier use of incised stones for monumental purposes, and also in regard to a probable connection in its earlier phases between the makers of brasses and the enamellers of Limoges and the Rhine Continental brasses, in a number of cases, were adorned with coloured enamels. In this country coloured mastic was more frequently used, and indications of this appear in several of the rubbings of the older brasses. The engraving of English brasses is, in technique, more nearly allied to the method of copper plate engravers than is the case with those by foreign makers, who seem to have used tools giving results approaching to those to be obtained with a chisel rather than with a burin. The use of cross hatching by the English craftsmen is especially to be noted as a point of resemblance to the technique of the line engraver. The Continental brasses almost always consisted of rectangular plates, the whole ground of which was covered with the subject. The English habit tended rather in the direction of irregular shapes, figures set within detached canopies or other framework, and sunk into the stone in separate sections. At the same time the existence in England of a number of foreign made brasses must not be forgotten. In some instances, where the workmanship is almost certainly of native origin, it has been found to have been executed on plates still bearing, on their reverse sides, the remains of earlier foreign work.

One more suggestion may be made as to the use of this collection. It will be worth while for students of pen drawing to devote some attention to the rubbings as such. In many cases, the massing of black and white is so good, and also the treatment of the drapery and ornamental details in white line on black ground, or the reverse, that the rubbings may well claim the attention of those working at the more decorative branches of book illustration and book ornament, as models full of valuable and practicable suggestion.

An abstract of the chief subjects dealt with in the catalogue, follows.

ARMS AND ARMOUR

The period covered by the rubbings of brasses having figures in armour, ranges from the year 1277 to 1680, with no break of more than a few years. The Museum collection, in this class, is headed with a rubbing of the famous brass of Sir John D'Auberon in Stoke d'Abernon Church, Surrey, the earliest known example of the representation of a knight in armour, on a monumental brass, in any country (A.D. 1277). He is represented in complete chain mail, with a loose surcoat, and the figure is important in the history of the development of armour, as showing the first beginnings of the reinforcement of chain mail knee pieces (genouillières)—probably of plate covered with decorated leather—which afterwards developed into complete plate armour. This process of evolution can easily be followed throughout its whole course, the next style of importance being the appearance of plates of steel fastened with straps around the limbs, and fixed over the chain mail, as in a brass of a knight of the Fitzralph family, at Pebmarsh, Essex. Sollerets (lames of plate, rivetted together and fastened with straps passing under the feet) also appear in this figure.

Following Mr C. H. Ashdown's classification of the subject, the Cyclas Period (1325-1335) saw the introduction of various modifications in the shape of the helmet and other details, as well as the use of the garment characteristic of the time. The collection includes rubbings of the three brasses which furnish authority for the armour of this epoch, viz.—those of Sir John de Creke, 1325, Sir John D'Aubernoun, 1327, and Sir John de Northwode, 1330.

The period from 1335 to 1360 was one of transition, experiments being made in new defences of plate, of cuir bouilli strengthened with banded or chain mail, and of the older forms of the latter kind of armour. Helmets and bascinets also underwent considerable change, the enlargement of the crested helm being a noticeable feature. The most interesting rubbing comprised within this period is certainly that of the brass in memory of Sir Hugh Hastings, at Elsing (described by Mr A. Hartshorne, in Archæologia, Vol. 60), in spite of its mutilated condition. This is worth referring to, not merely for the sake of the armour—of which the several figures supply typical and varying representations—but for its fine ornament and the graceful design of the whole composition, as well as of its separate panels. It is an early example of an architectural framework with figures set within niches, and the fact that these figures are mainly secular (representing King Edward III and seven of his nobles) render it unique in this respect. The rubbing of the brass of William de Aldeburgh, 1360, is also a good example for reference, and is stated by Haines to be the latest on which the shield occurs.

From 1360 to 1410 the fashion of armour is more constant. The plate defences of the limbs are now carried farther, and are modelled to conform with the shapes they enclose. The use of the Jupon, a sleeveless tight fitting garment reaching from the neck to below the knees, gave occasion for a display of rich decoration which is characteristic of the period. Many opportunities to students of pattern, for fixing the dates of textile ornament, can be derived from rubbings from the contemporary brasses. Similarly the elaborate sword belts and sword furniture now favoured, throw light on the arts both of the goldsmith and of the embroiderer. These belts were often studded with gems or enriched with enamels, and were fastened with elaborate and beautiful clasps. This tendency towards increase of ornamental effect—which was equally apparent in the changes of secular costume—showed itself also in the luxuriant forms of heraldic crests, made of cur bouilli, and often of large size. The panache of feathers was a favourite form. The brasses of Sir Ralph de Knevynton (1370), the Earl of Warwick (1406), Sir N. Hauberk (1407) and a Knight of the D'Esby family in Spilsby Church, Lincolnshire (1410) are typical of the period, and the brass of a Knight at Laughton, Lincs (c. 1400) supplies good examples both of canopy work and of the richness of the sacred furniture in use at this time.

About the year 1410, the surcoat was discarded finally, and we now have examples of complete suits of plate with no textile covering of any kind. The brass of Sir Thomas Swynborne, at Little Horkeley Church, Essex (1412), with its fine sword furniture, and collar of S S, that of Sir Simon de Melbrygge, h G (1416), and of Baron Camoys (1419) and of Sir W. Calthorp (1420) well represent the period to 1430, when further developments began to be apparent. Two indications of these changes can be seen in the fan shaped coudieres (elbow pieces) in the Camoys brass, and the elaborate bascinet of that of Sir W. Calthorp. Shields also now assumed still greater variety of form, and are generally notched for the lance.

The period from 1430 to about 1500, witnessed, says Mr Ashdown, "every device in armour that the art of man could evolve produced under those circumstances which would best achieve the desired result, namely, the stress of urgent need." The name by which this age is known, that of "the Tabard Period," has been selected by reason of the Tabard

"being practically the only distinguishing feature which did not change, and was fairly persistent throughout. Good examples of the Tabard, so interesting from the heraldic point of view, are supplied by the present collection, and among them may be mentioned the brasses of William Tyndern (1444), at Childrey, Berks, and of a member of the Scarisbrick family at Ormskirk (c 1500). Head gear became greatly varied, and the elaboration of some of the secondary defences of the plate, produced occasionally results almost fantastic, as in the brasses of R Quintraine at Thame (1460) and Robert Staunton, Donington (1458). The brasses of Lord Le Strange, at Hillingdon (1477) and of Sir T Peyton, Isleham (1484) are representative of the progress of the styles, and that of Sir W Mauntell, at Heyford (1487) may also be usefully referred to.

The next fifty years were marked chiefly by a simplification of the more elaborate devices of the last named period. A closed helmet was generally used, and a revival of the use of chain mail, in the form of skirts, is a definite characteristic. The armour of the time, is, as a rule, both less interesting and less beautiful, though examples having both qualities are still to be found. Attention may be given to the brasses of Sir Roger L'Estrange, at Hunstanton (1506), Sir T Bullen, at Haver (1538), in the full insignia of the Order of the Garter, and Sir R Verney, at Aldbury (1546), as among the best of the kind. During the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the decadence—caused, of course, by the new conditions following the introduction and development of fire arms—became prominent. The brass plate was generally thinner and rolled instead of cast, shading was largely used, in place of the fine simplicity of the lines of the older work, which expressed only the essential features of the designs, and, in other respects, the work is both artistically and technically on a lower level. Armour became, more and more, only a matter of pageantry. Two specimens of that worn for service, may be mentioned as indications of the final stage of the subject, viz. that of T Windham, at Felbrigg (c 1608), and of R Bartelot, at Stopham (1614). The latest example of military costume in the Museum Collection of Rubbings is that of N Toke, at Great Chart, Kent (1680).

CIVIL COSTUME.

The examples of the costume of male civilians (other than those specially classified below) range from the brass of J De Bladigdone, at East Wickham, Kent, of about the year 1325, to that of Il Balgay, Hope, Derbyshire, dated 1685, with one late 18th century specimen, dated 1773. For the purposes of the student, the earlier are the more important—those that preceded the popularisation of the painted or engraved portrait in the 16th century. The collection includes 32 rubbings taken from the brasses of the 14th century, notably those of the mutilated brass of Adam de Walsokne, at St Margaret's, Lynn (1349), Robert de Paris at Hildersham (1379), J Curteys at Wymington, Beds (1391), and of J Corp, Stoke Fleming, Devon, of the same date. Although, naturally enough in the circumstances, there is in this class an absence of the elaboration of ornamental detail often seen in brasses of men in armour, they well illustrate the main lines of the costume of the wealthier classes, methods of dressing the hair, the disposition of buttons and similar matters. One of the most striking and most elaborate is the brass of Robert Braunche and his wives, at St Margaret's, Lynn (1364), with, below the effigies, a famous representation of a "Peacock Feast," with nine men and three women at table, besides servants, musicians, etc., and this also may be taken as a good example of the class of work done, at the time, by Flemish brass makers. It may be pointed out that a notable feature of this class, is the group of representations of wealthy citizens, and particularly of the wool merchants. Such details as hunting knives, pouches, girdles, and the like can also be well studied in these rubbings.

The section of female costume is interesting, not only on account of the complete view it presents of the changes of fashion in women's dresses from about the year 1310 to 1694, but also for the beauty of the drawing of many of the figures, and of the treatment of accessories, such as cushions, embroideries and lace, patterned fabrics and jewellery. The brass of the wife of Robert Skern, 1437, for instance, has a particularly good pendant and cloak clasp, and the kneeling figure of Joan Wyddowsoun, at Mickleham, is a particularly interesting example of a complete costume of the period, with an elaborate girdle. For this latter detail, the brasses of E Cheyne (1516), a brass at Assington (1500), and Malyn Harte (1557) may be referred to among many others. Costume in the 16th and 17th centuries shows an increasing variety of pattern, and the use of laces embroidery, as in the brasses of Anne Lovell (1545), a brass at Staplehurst (1577), Aphra Hawkins (1605), and Mary Leventhorp (1600). The dis inctive dress of widows is made the subject of a separate classification—as also are those of Ecclesiastical (grouped in accordance with the various vestments), Monastic, Academical, and Judicial Costume. The Collection also supplies a valuable series of specimens of lettering of various dates.

CIVIL COSTUME

FEMALE

Note —Brasses with both male and female effigies, already entered in the lists of Military, Civil (Male) and Judicial Costume, are included in the following list, the name of the male only being given, with the letter M, C or J, indicating their respective sections substituted for description and place. Kneeling and half effigies are described in all cases.

Where description and place are inserted, the brass is that of a female only

Widows are given in a separate list

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS.

In Continental brasses greater prominence is given to what, in British brasses, would be described as secondary features—representations of scriptural events, figures of saints and angels, shields, etc—which in many cases altogether overshadow the other effigies. The latter part of the scheme of abbreviations, used in describing the British brasses, has therefore been modified, as follows —

- B = Brass
 - IS = Incised slab.
 - a. = Dresses worn over armour
 - b. = Escutcheons
 - c = The Holy Trinity
 - d. = The Crucifixion.
 - e. = The Resurrection
 - f. = The Blessed Virgin and Child
 - g. = The Evangelistic Symbols
 - h. = Angels
